it on the long run? I believe this guy has a lot of potential to be a solid big man in the league, and if he got his nose fixed and the lower legs he'd be an awesome defender. He'll be my favorite Pistons defender for the next few years. Jay-Z It's a very solid debut album. He has some solid production with "Watch ubniverse" featuring 112 and a very hard song in "I hate you, I like you" featuring Shawnna. The in-between song choices, however, are a little sloppy. And this could be a future problem for this album, since the singles come out a lot faster than normal. His last album, Reasonable Doubt, had a similar problem, though it was at least three years in the making. Overall it's a very solid debut album and he's definitely worth the hype. I think we'll see him getting much more recognition in the next couple of years. Darius Morris Morris' game is what kept me coming back, he's hard to play against and very consistent in what he does. His shot selection is also decent for a rookie and he rebounds and protects the paint well for a guy in his position. Tayshaun Prince and Jason Maxiell are solid in the pick and roll, but I would give Morris a slight edge. He can get to the basket and move his feet in space a lot better than either of them. Morris can hit the mid range jump shot but has to work on his threes. He's probably going to have a much better rookie season than most people expect. Corey Maggette I hate him, I really do. A lot of people hate him, even the fan base. His game is so inconsistent and it makes it really tough to watch. It's actually even more frustrating because he was my favorite basketball player at one point. Coming out of high school, I thought he was the best player in the country and would go on to be a great NBA player. But, he's really struggled with almost all of his teams he's been in. Always falling out of coach's favor, and even on one of the top teams he's ever played on, the Toronto Raptors, he
