About the Story The authors, Anna Bigatti and Dan Hamilton, were out camping in Wasaga Beach, a town that, as the authors say, "sort of lives" in The Great Lakes. They had gone to the beach to wait out a storm—or at least they intended to. In point of fact, the storm was almost over, and when they woke the next morning, they found only a few ripples in the water, and the beach was empty.

Maybe the fishing boats had left during the night, and maybe a few beachcombers had woken up refreshed to see a lovely sunrise, but the snow was falling on the lake, and very soon the area would be snow covered for the winter. The authors decided to pack up and head home: one of their dogs was tired of camp life, and they figured that "the snow was arriving" and that they had a long walk home. Despite the change in conditions, the authors continued north—for, after all, they had made this journey before. Perhaps they had hoped to find that their footprints were unchanged, that the snow lay undisturbed over the old tracks, or that their dogs, who wouldn't be able to follow through the snow, had returned with them on the beach. In any case, the authors followed the old footprints without knowing why. The tracks led them north across a vast tract of "open water." It seems that this little note is to explain how they ended up in the ocean. The authors continued north, following the footprints. Suddenly they were surrounded by people in snowsuits. They were
